HAND MADE IN HOLLAND

Fashion designer Judith van Vliet and shoe designer Amber Ambrose Aurele have launched their first collaboration.

In their first collaboration, Judith and Amber started their quest for durability. The designers present their collection wherein craftsmanship and sustainability plays the number one role. The fashion industry is one of the most polluting in the world in this very moment, and its about time something changed for the better.

These two women questioned whether they could do better and make the start with their own work to make a difference. The result is this collection 'Van Hollandse Bodem' or in English "Hand made in Holland", which is almost entirely made of honest, Dutch produce. In its designs, Judith and Amber specifically chose to use locally treated resources coming from manufacturers that still adhere to quality but also respect the environment and providing honest wages spread out across their production facilities.

They chose to use locally produced fabrics and commodities, and specifically those that have been treated in the right way without chemicals overdoing their functionalities. Hemp, wool and linnen and high quality Dutch resources, which are much easier to grow than for instance cotton, remain under appreciated. Many of these fabrics are now being produced more commercially by Enschede textielstad. Most of these modern day fabrics are made from locally recycled produce or overproduction, such as a very strong and healthy leather coming from wild fish, which is usually regarded as a byproduct of the industry. The food industry and our beautiful collection of sheep also provides a great selection of high quality wool - normally just disregarded in the process but honestly, are great and useful resources that can be used in all sorts of different methods.

In conclusion, the two young Dutch designers take some of their inspiration from sincere Dutch heritage, such as Dutch art movement The Stijl and participating architects such as Ben van Berkel. What also comes to mind is Delfts Blue, wind mills, fisherman's knitted sweaters and the sea - the one part being a crucial part which has always been in motion and upon which a large part of our country is built upon after Mother Nature had her way. Tight lines and primary colors move into more abstract shapes. Straight tops with supple trousers moving straight into colour block and dip dye.
